THE MILK IN THE COCOANUT.

It turns out now that the real cause of Mark Twain's recent funny and ferocious protest against the works of Hotten in introducing his works to the English public, with his (Hotten's) swash interlarded, was not wholly literary rage; for it is related that Hotten, when in California, made a whimsical reference to Mark Twain's marriage. The humorist never could abide him afterward. Hotten's "notice" was not without humor, as will be seen. It runs: "Mark Twain, who, when he has been long enough sober to permit an estimate, has been uniformly found to bear a spotless character, has got married. It was not the act of a desperate man—it was not committed while laboring under temporary insanity; his insanity is not of that type, nor does he labor; it was the cool, methodical, cumulative calculation of human nature working in the breast of an orphan hankering for some one with a fortune to love; some one with a bank account to caress."

For years he has felt this matrimony coming on. Ever since he left California there has been an undertone of despair running through all his letters, like the subdued wail of a piper beneath a wash-tub. He felt that he was going, that no earthly power could save him; but as a concession to his weeping publishers, he tried a change of climate by putting on a linen coat and writing letters from the West Indies. Then he tried rhubarb, and during his latter months he was constantly under the influence of this powerful drug. But rhubarb, while it may give a fitful glitter to the eye and a deceitful redness to the gills, cannot long delay the pangs of approaching marriage. Rhubarb was not what Mark wanted. Well, that genial spirit has passed away; that loving, bright smile will no more greet the early barkeeper, nor the familiar "chalk it down" delight his ear. Poor mark! He was a good schemer, but he couldn't be made to work."
